Cube Inkstand

This compact inkstand provided a complete kit for the eighteenth-century letter-writer. Click on the turned lid to open the inkwell. The top has holes in it to take pens (goose quills). Now click on the drawers. You will notice that the bottom one is drilled with holes. This was to contain a powder called 'pounce' made from ground cuttlefish shell (the white shell usually found in a budgie cage) or pumice stone. Pounce was sprinkled on a correction or on paper that had not been treated (sized) to take ink, to stop the ink from spreading. The top drawer was used to store wafers (little discs of gum and flour used to seal letters when moistened).
